INVESTMENT COMMENTARY

Global equities further advanced in November as the market began to sense inflation expectations peaking. The future will reveal whether this intuition proves correct. Additionally, tangible signs of China softening its stubborn zero-Covid policy fuelled the best monthly rally in Chinese equities since the late 1990s. While SKAGEN Global does not own any domestic or Chinese-listed companies, the fund has exposure to the vast Chinese consumer market through its holdings in names such as Nike, Hermes and Estee Lauder, all of which performed well during the month on the back of the reopening news. SKAGEN Global outperformed the benchmark in November. The fund's top absolute performer was the Danish freight-forwarder DSV which recovered some ground after launching a sizeable buyback program in the wake of its Q3 report driven by its highly cash-generative business model. The worst performer in absolute terms was the US software and professional services company Intuit, which announced a notable slowdown in its Credit Karma division, but still reported decent overall quarterly figures for the group. We will comment on portfolio trading activity, if any, at quarter end. The portfolio continues to look significantly undervalued for investors with a multi-year time horizon and the ability to withstand intermittent volatility. It is important to remember that the equity market rarely advances for long in a straight line, no matter how much we would prefer it to continuously creep upwards in small steady increments.
